By 1880, the building trade had achieved a state of respectability in the far western United States. The previous year had seen the publication of The Quarterly Architectural Review in San Francisco. This publication was the predecessor of the California Architect & Building Review which began publication in January 1880, and from which most of the following information was collected. This publication changed its name to California Architect & Building News in January 1882. The year 1881 saw formation of the Facific Coast Association of Architects, which later became the San Francisco Chapter of the American Institute of Architects. The number of architects, builders and contractors active in the West, as listed in each issue of California Architect & Building News, reflected the continuous growth in building. This growth is also reflected in increasing advertising by building-related industries and trades such as lumber, brick, stone and hardware. There were articles reflecting the constant experiments by those striving to improve materials and techniques.

There was an obvious public interest in architectural styles and trends. The decade with which this paper concerns itself saw a rapid and almost constant transition from one style to another, beginning with the declining Italianate style, through the Second Empire style and Strip Style, both of which peaked in the 1880's, to the Shingle Style, Queen Anne style, and Richardson Romanesque, all three of which carried over into the next decade. While the trends in styles were usually about five years behind developments in the eastern United States, it is obvious that the West had lost some of its frontier character and that creature comforts and respectability were being activel; sought.

Finally, there was the beginning of a high degree of standardization of materials and general designs in use by architects, with specific details being varied to suit the architectural style currently in vogue. This latter point is well illustrated by the books of Samuel and Joseph C. Newsom, San Francisco architects of this period.

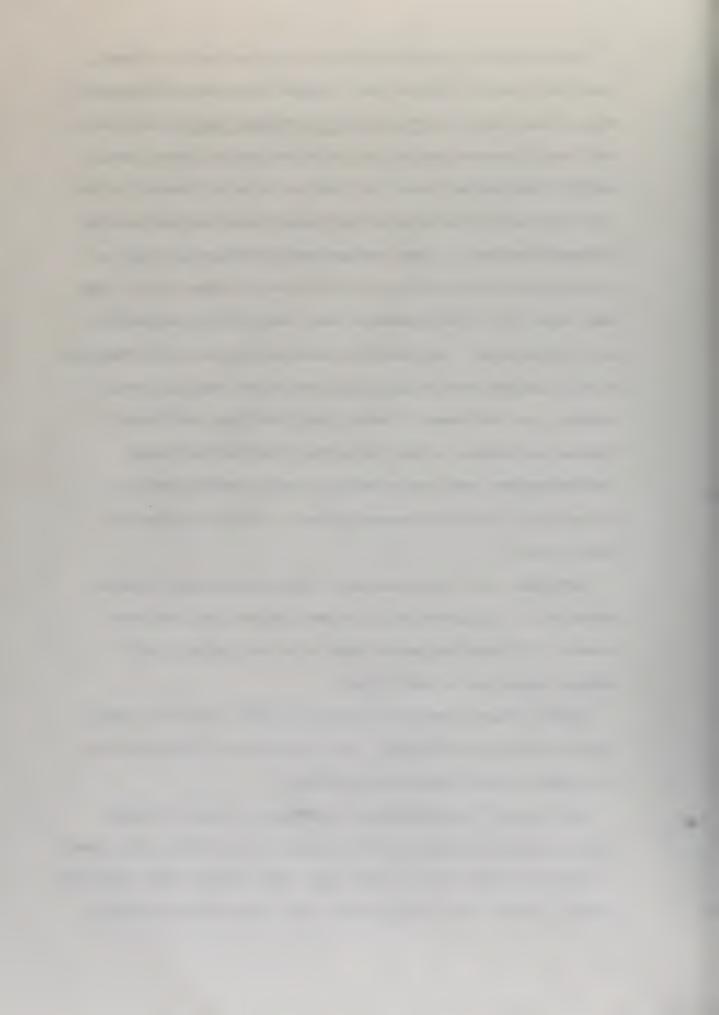

In addition to their architectural work for specific clients. Samuel and Joseph C. Newsom also rublished three books of selected designs under the title Picturesque Californian Homes. Valuable in that they illustrate popular designs of the period, often listing specific location and owner, the books are also of interest in that they list standardized material and design specifications used by the Newsom brothers. These standardized specifications could be given to the contractor along with the specific house plans. This would serve to let the contractor know what types of materials to use in given areas. As there were other architects in San Francisco at this time who were designing far more houses than the Newsom brothers, such as Thomas J. Welsh, Henry Geilfuss, the firm of Townsend and Wyneken to name but a few, I believe that such standardizations were very probably in use by other architects of the period. Selected Newsom brothers' standardizations are listed below.

MATERIALS: All timber was to be best quality, well seasoned Oregon pine. All lumber was to be best quality, well seasoned Redwood. All doors and sashes were to be best quality, well seasoned sugar pine or white pine.

DRAINS: These were to be of six inch iron stone with joints cemented with Fortland cement. All Y's, turns and traps were to be eighteen inches below the lot surface.²

BRICK WORK: The contractor was directed to use well-burned brick, with mortar made up of Santa Cruz lime and clean, sharp sand.

SIZE OF TIMBERS, ETC.: Wall caps, 2"x8" redwood: main sills and trimmers, 6"x6" pine; plates, 2"x4" pine; studs below main sills,

4"x4" redwood: studs at the corne s, 4"x6" redwood: braces at foundation, 3"x4" redwood: joists, first tier, 2"x10" pine: joists, second tier, 2"x12" pine: basement joists, 2"x6" redwood: ceiling joists, 2"x6" pine; rafters, 2"x4" pine: studs, 2"x4" pine: all corners, doors and windows to be doubled, 4"x4" pine: some closet partitions may be 2"x3" pine: bridging and bracing above main sills, 2"x4" pine: side strips to carry joists, 1"x4" pine: studs and joists to be sixteen inches between centers; rafters to be two feet eight inches between centers: foundation studs to be two feet eight inches between centers.

HEIGHT OF STORIES: Basement, six feet five inches; first story, twelve feet: second story, eleven feet six inches. 5

ROOF: This was to be shingled with sixteen inch, sawed redwood shingles, laid four inches to the weather, two nails to each shingle.

FLOORS: These were to be of best quality Oregon pine, 7/8"x4".7

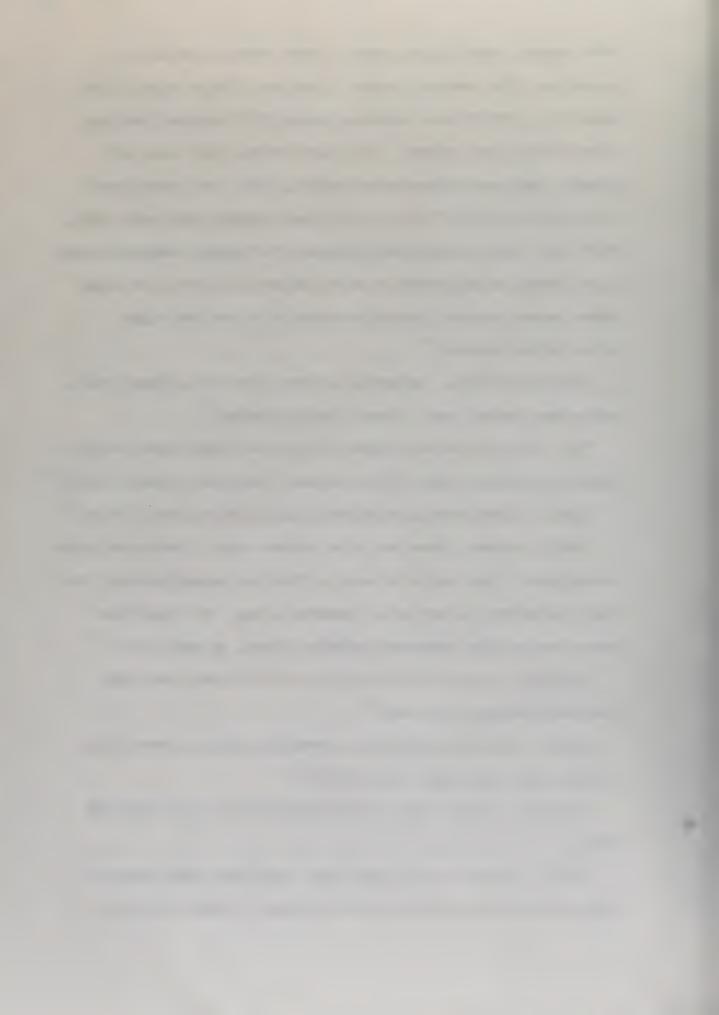

GLASS: Basement glass was to be sixteen ounce. Twenty-one ounce crystal sheet glass was to be used in first and second stories. The hall windows were to have plain cathedral glass. The front door transom was to have ornamented cathedral glass, to cost $25.00.

CRESTINGS: To be of iron at a cost of fifty cents per foot, with posts costing $1.00 each.

DOORS: All doors except those specified different were to be of clear, dry white pine, double faced. 10

BASEBOARD: These were to be ten in the swide in all rooms and halls. 11

STAIRS: These were to be of clear, dry Oregon pine, rise and tread being as specified in individual plans. Newels, rails and balusters were to be as per detail; on the plans, of selected dry walnut. The newel was to be one olid piece of 8"x8" walnut, and the posts were to be 6"x6" solid walnut. 12

MANTELS: These were to be furnished by the owner. 13

BATHROOF: This room was to be ceiled all around to a height of five feet with narrow, one inch tongue and groove. The tub was to be neatly encased and capped with walnut. 14

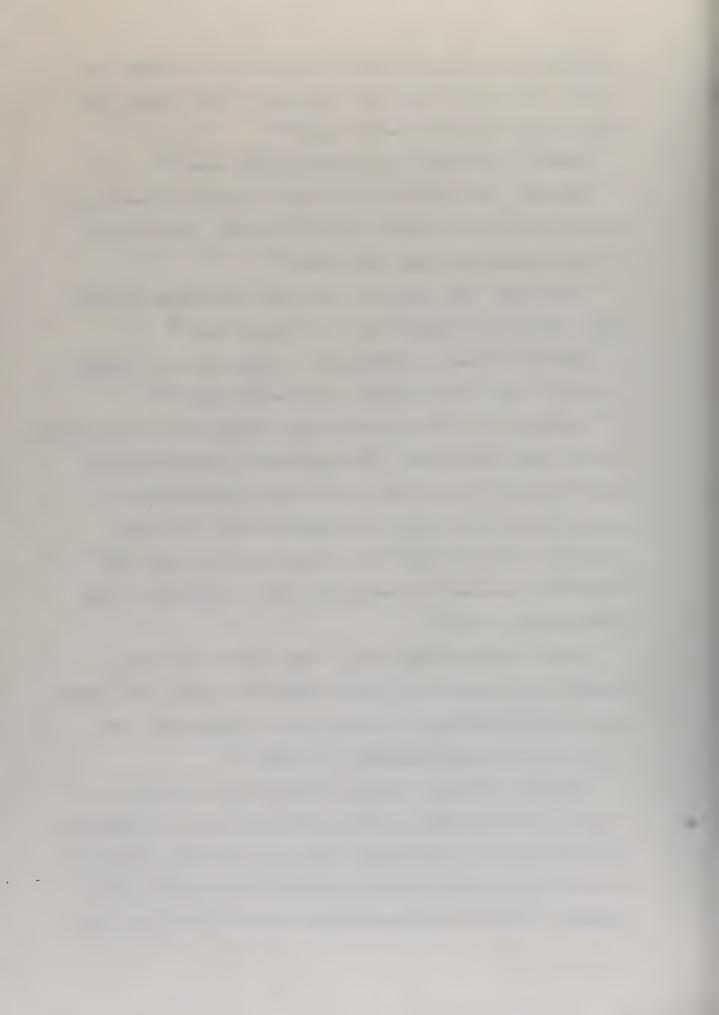

DINING ROOM: This room was to have panel wainscoting four feet high, using ten inch panels with a neat cap and base. 15

LATHING: All walls, partitions and ceilings were to be lathed with sound lath, of full thickness, laid on 3/8" apart. 16

PLASTERING: All walls, partitions and ceilings were to be plastered with one good coat of brown, well-haired mortar, which was made of pure "unslacked" lime and clean, sharp sand, free from loam and salt, and best cattle hair, to be thoroughly mixed. The brown mortar was then to be covered with a good coat of the best white hard-finish, composed of finishing lime-putty and plaster of Paris and clean white sand. 17

PLASTER CORNICES, ARCHES, ETC.: Where shown on the plans, a plaster stucco cornice was to be run around the ceiling, with twelve inches on the side wall, and twelve inches on the ceiling. This was to be of such style as shown by the details. 18

PAINTING: Exterior: The body of the work was to be painted as directed. The front door and other outside doors were to be painted with three coats and then grained walnut and varnished. The roof was to receive two coats of "Prince's Metallic," as was all tin work. 19
Interior: The stair rail and balusters and newel were to be filled with wood filler and finished with two coats of shellac and rubbed down with pumice-stone and oil to an even surface. All other woodwork on the interior, unless otherwise directed, was to have three good coats of the best white lead paint. The woodwork in all rooms, halls and vestibules so designated were to be grained in imitation of oak and walnut and finished with one good coat of varnish and one coat of wax. 19

PLUMBING: The water pipes were to be of galvanized iron. 20

TANK: This was to be of seventy-five gallon capacity, cooper-made, of $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch redwood, with a 1-1/8 inch cover. ²¹

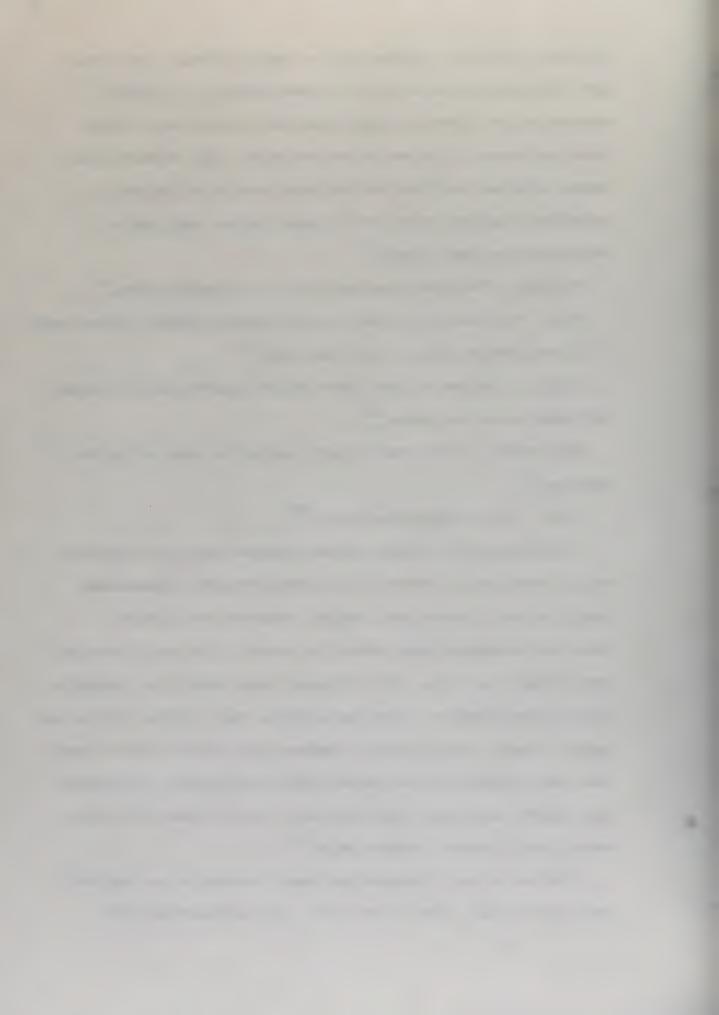

BOILER: This was to be of forty gallon capacity, made of copper and placed on an iron stand. 22

WASH BASINS: These were to have a marble top made to fit the position. 23

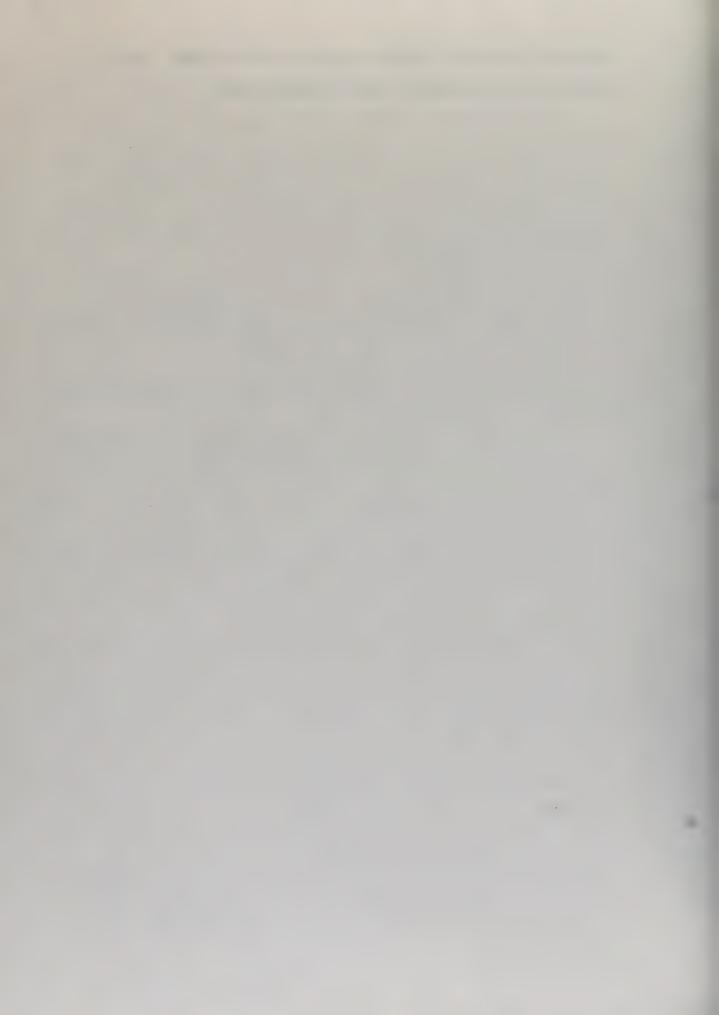

SINK: To be of galvanized steel. 24

In addition to the aforementioned selected items, the following are all specifically covered in the Newsom brothers' standardized specifications: Excavations; grading; chimneys; ventilators; rustic and sheathing; step ladder (for access to the roof); scuttle; front steps; rear steps; front entrance; angle beeds (sic); verandah; inside blinds; outside blinds; sash, glass, etc.; finials; kitchen and pantry; closets; water closet in basement or on porch; kitchen pantry; wash tubs; finish of walls; center pieces and brackets; gas fitting; slop hopper; wash trays; bath tub; water closet in basement; safes; waste pipes; tinning; electric bells. 25

With such a set of standardized specifications in one hand and the specific house plans in the other, the contractor was well prepared to undertake speedy construction of the house. Such standardization anticipated modern building codes.

Once the home was erected, it remained for the owner to decide upon the color schemes for both exterior and interior. The period 1880 to 1889, as mentioned before, was a period of rapid transition in architectural styles, but these seem not to have dictated the decor. During the decade, and probably in the Seventies as well, the exterior color schemes of houses were quite polychromatic, not unlike some of the color schemes applied to these houses today by their present owners, though today's schemes are probably ninety-nine percent unresearched. And then, as today, some of the color schemes were not well thought out and received the criticism of the architects and painters of the period, as stated in the California Architect & Building News.

As an example, mention is made of a house seen painted in the following scheme: The first story was painted Venetian red (a color very close to burnt sienna), the second story was olive, with dark olive brown trim overall. The writer considered this combination bad in its application, but no worse than many others he had seen. The writer went on to explain that the problem lay in the balance of the scheme, with the red, a comparatively light color, being made to support the heaviness of the olive. He suggested transposing the colors, making the dark olive brown of the trim become the color of the body of the first story, leaving the olive on the second story, and using the Venetian red for the trim, along with small quantities of yellow and blue. By using this application, the dark color seems to support the house, while the lighter color of the second story lifts and brightens the structure, as do the warm colors of the trim. The writer went on to note that this scheme would work well on a relatively p'ain house, but if the house were one containing a number of bay windows, gables, porches and balconies, then it would require several more colors or shades of colors. 26

Bright colors were to be used to emphasize the trim as a general rule. The trim in this period could vary from relatively plain to full-blown, scroll-sawed gingerbread. In one cited example, the body of the house would be pea green, with olive applied to the cornice, window frames, stoop and piazza. The olive would then be trimmed with red. This use of color to emphasize trim was also applied to business buildings, as confirmed by the citation of a business building painted blue, with a yellow cornice. 27

Cottages (which were not necessarily, as we tend to think of them today, small) presented their own set of problems regarding exterior paint. The cottage was often quite fancy, with numerous gables, bay windows, balconies, and a projecting second story.

It was suggested that if it were desired to paint one of these structures in one basic color, then at least four distinct shades of that color should be used. The darkest shade should be used for the first story, the next shade lighter for the second story, the next lighter for those gables which were separated from the second story by any ornamental band or balcony, with the lightest shade being used for the trim.

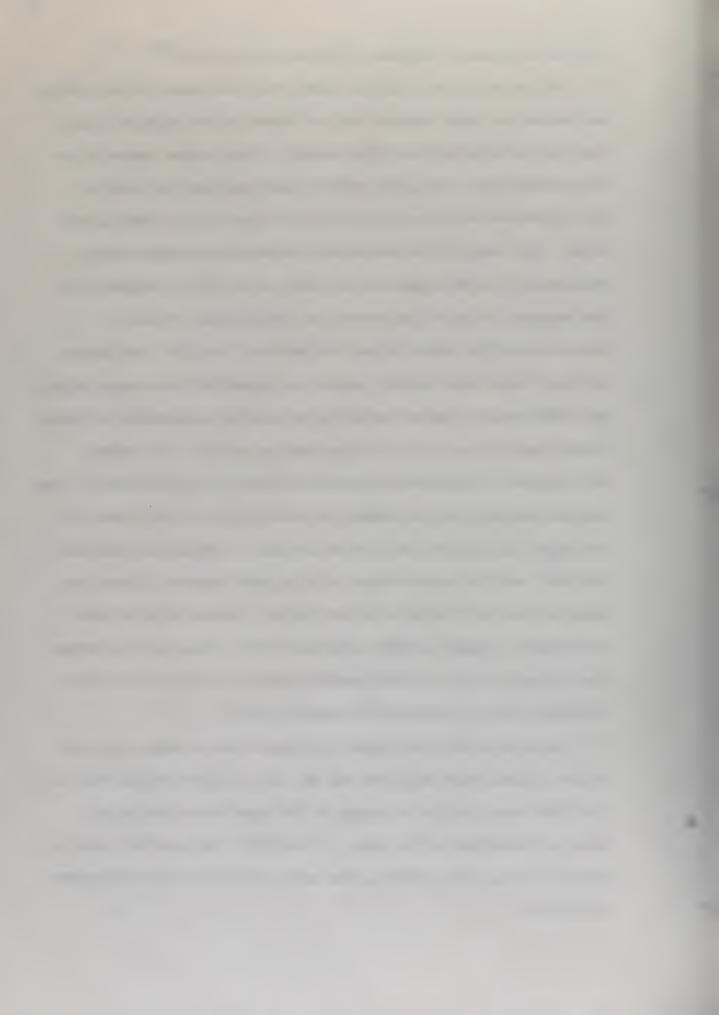

Of course, a polychromatic paint scheme could also be applied to the cottage. One suggested scheme would use dark olive green for the first story and all trim. The shingled second story (a common feature on the cottage) should be stained red, as should the roof, giving the appearance of being tiled. Finally, the gables were to be painted a citrine, or ellow olive, color. 28

With regard to the shingled house, which was common in California and became even more popular with the advent of the Shingle Style, staining the exterior was often adopted. Since stains tended to be less durable than paint, the weather would wash out the color in varying degrees which had the effect of softening and blending the tints. This was felt to have a more charming appearance than the monotonously bright appearance of paint, which did not soften with the passage of time to the extent that stains did. It was a picturesque effect which suited the tastes of the time (the Newsom brothers' book lists several houses in a so-called Picturesque Style), and which would be better suited to present-day restorations of these houses than the use of modern, long-wearing paints. The stains were applied by mixing with turpentine or oil in a thin mixture. The surface afterward was to receive two coats of oil to help preserve the color and lengthen the life of the wood. Vinegar was sometimes used as a vehicle for the stain, with reported success. Often the shingles were left in their natural color. Redwood shingles were particularly popular in this unfinished state. This practice became more widespread later in the decade as the Shingle Style came into popularity, but is mentioned as early as 1883.

The color schemes as applied to shingled houses were also quite bright. Among those mentioned was the use of a dark reddish tone on the first story, yellow or orange on the upper story, and a dull shade of blue-green on the trim. It was felt that contrast could be varied by using warm colors on the body of the house and cool colors on the trim.

A graded treatment using different shades of the same color was thought to be more harmonious. A suggested scheme in this mode would use three shades of green, with the darkest on the first story, and the lighter shades on the second and upper stories. Trim could then be a dull red, as could the roof. The suggested mixture for this dull red was to use Venetian red, burnt umber, and lamp-black. 29

It must be recognized that there was not the wide range of exterior colors available during this period that we enjoy today. Certain colors were not durable enough for exterior use and so were used in but a limited fashion. By the same token, there were those colors which had good durability and saw widespread use. Among the more durable colors were the ochres, Indian and Venetian red (virtually the same color), burnt and raw umber, burnt and raw sienna, zinc white, lamp-black and vegetable black, yellow ochre and Naples yellow, light red and madder lake. The only durable blue in use was ultramarine, which had the drawback of being quite expensive. The most durable greens were those produced directly from copper and arsenic, which rendered them understandably injurious to health if handled carelessly. Those colors not suitable for exterior use included chrome yellow, chrome green, Prussian blue, white lead, vermillion, chrome red, cobalt, Antwerp blue, and indigo. As can be seen by comparing the two lists, the natural clay or earth colors were generally more durable than the manufactured chemical colors. 30

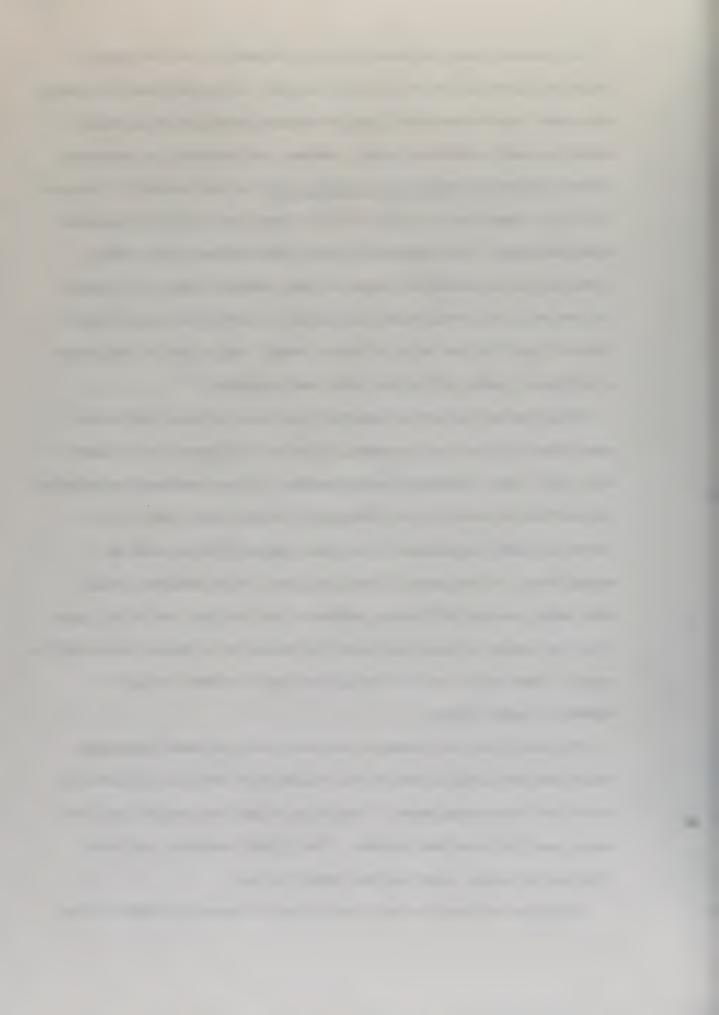

In general, there is less specific information on the interior decor of houses in the West in this period. We do not have information as to what colors one should apply to which rooms, or which woods should be used in certain rooms. Rather, the information contained in the California Architect & Building News is more general. The most specific information available is that regarding interior decoration using wallpaper. The exception to the above is one entry which, referring to bed-chambers, suggested oak woodwork, with pink shades for the walls of north rooms, and middle to dark olive green with a touch of gold for the walls of south rooms. For either of the above a ceiling of pale, soft olive green was suggested. 31

While on the subject of interior painting, ceilings and walls were often finished in distemper, in which the pigments were mixed with size. When finishing in this manner, it was necessary to prepare the surface in order to stop absorption, which could result in an uneven or spotty appearance. One such preparation was made by mixing about twelve pounds of whiting (pure white powdered chalk) with water, adding sufficient parchment size to bind the color, plus about two ounces of alum and about two ounces of soft-soap dissolved in water. This was to be mixed well, and then strained through a screen or coarse cloth.

The best size for distemper was made from parchment clippings, which were put into an iron kettle filled with water and allowed to stand for twenty-four hours. This mixture was then boiled for five hours, and the scum then removed. The liquid remaining was then strained through a cloth and was ready for use.

The alum was added to help harden the distemper and cause it to dry solid and evenly. No mention was made as to the effect of the soft-soap, but I suspect it acted as a wetting agent, allowing the even spreading of the distemper at the time of application.

To mix colors, the whiting/size mixture and the color desired. finely ground, were dissolved separately, and then mixed to the desired tint. As an example, lamp black mixed with whiting produced, according to the amount of black used, any gray from the most delicate to the darkest shade. For French gray, the whiting was mixed with Prussian blue and black to the required tint or shade. Buff was produced by mixing whiting and yellow othre. For a warmer tone. Ventian red could be added to the foregoing color. For salmon, a touch of Venetian red was added to the whiting, just enough to tinge with color. Various drabs were produced by mixing in amounts of burnt umber. Of course, tastes did not remain static where interior decor was concerned, any more than they did with architectural styles, and color was not always in vogue. Evidence of this is borne out by the following statement in 1887: "White paint, white furniture, white walls and white woodwork are the latest agony."32 It was advised that the sooner the distemper dried after application, the better, and that to this end, all doors and windows should be closed during application and then opened immediately afterward. 33

It was recommended that woodwork, especially that in the kitchen, be painted every two or three years. In order to have the new paint adhere, the old paint was washed down with a moderately strong lye solution, using a short swab, and then wiped with a cloth moistened in fresh water. This removed all dirt and grease.

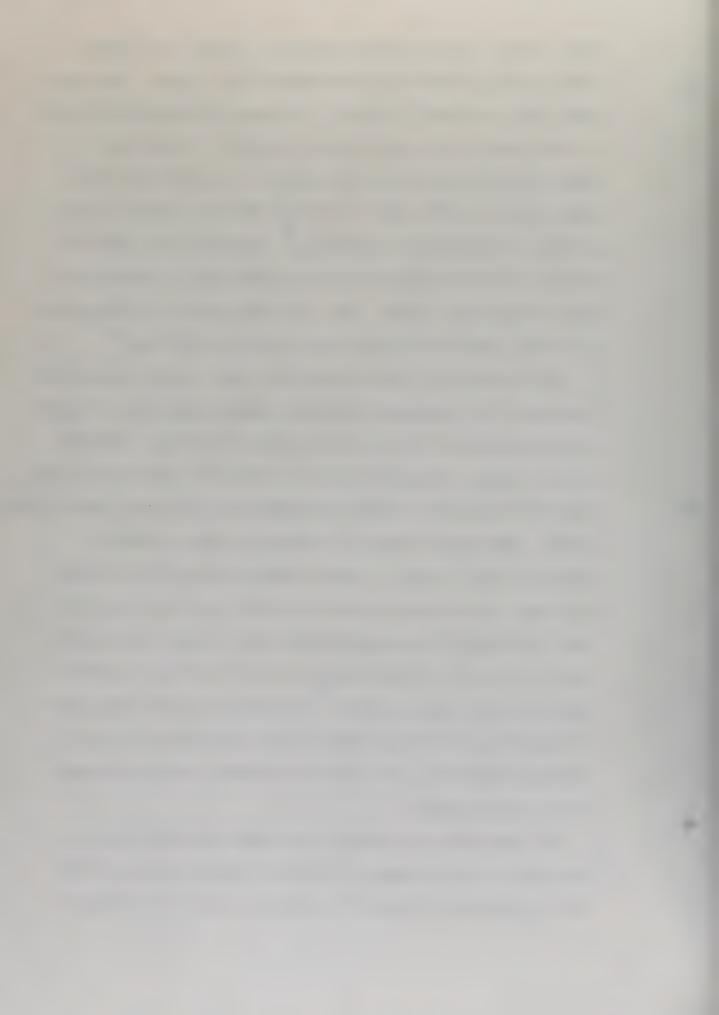

The paint for such woodwork has made of the best white lead, mixed with two parts of boiled linseed oil and one part lacquer, ending up with a product the consistency of thin cream. Such paint would dry to the touch in one day. Tinting was accomplished in much the same manner as was used with the distemper. A very small quantity of lamp black was used to produce a beautiful lead color. Yellow ochre was added until the desired shade was obtained for use on floors, baseboards or wainscoting. Hegarding the painting of woodwork, it was suggested that the baseboard color be cut onto the floor for about two inches. Then, if future rugs did not come close to the wall, the gap resulting would not be so unsightly. 35

The one aspect of interior decoration which received considerable attention in the California Architect & Building News was wall paper and paper hanging, and the problems inherent in making a tasteful choice of paper. Of special interest is the fact that these articles also deal with general interior decoration and reflect the tastes of the period. There was an attempt to balance the various elements within the room, so that no single element overpowered the others. For example, for a long room with a low ceiling, it was suggested that a wall paper with strongly marked lines be used, horizontal lines on the side walls and vertical on the end walls, in order to make the ceiling appear higher. The drawing room was dealt with in particular, since it was viewed as the most difficult room to decorate artistically, with its heavy cornices, prominent mantels, and very high ceiling.

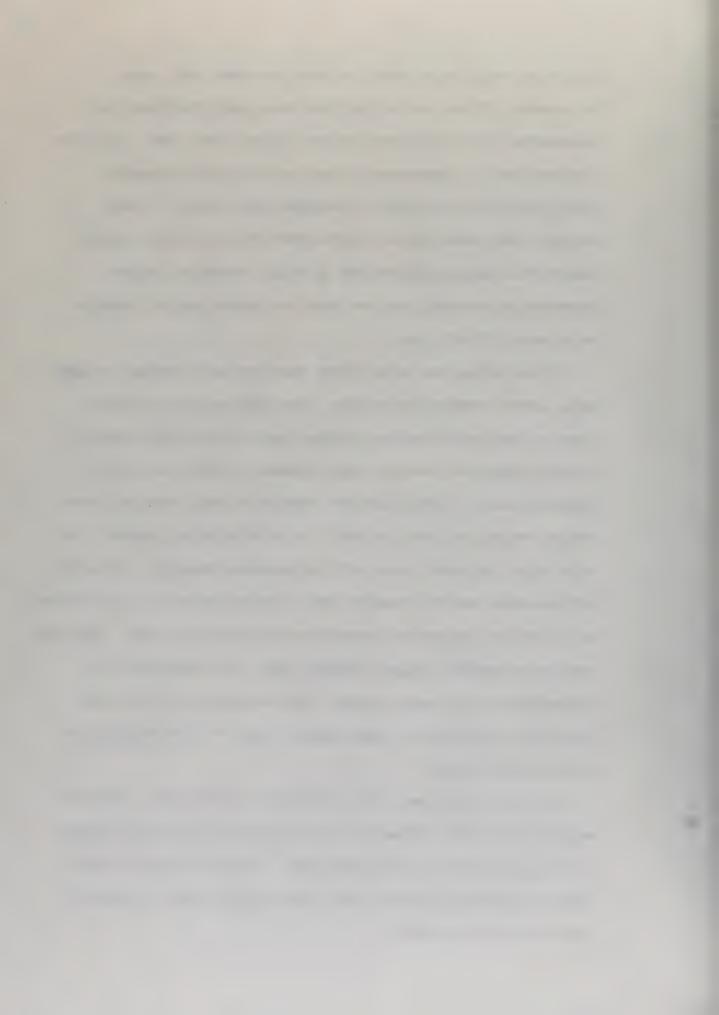

The first step was to remove the ornamental plaster boos in the center of the ceiling, an element of earlier decoration which had now passed out of style. The ceiling was then to be tinted in a color which would harmonize with the chosen wall paper. For example, if the tone of the room was a soft gray-blue, the recommended tint for the ceiling was a clear flesh pink. Or if the room was done in a gray-green picked out with black, then the ceiling would be best done in a subdued lemon color. It was mentioned that some people covered their ceilings with a single-colored wall paper, and bordered it with a stenciled pattern representing garlands, but that this was looked upon as being by far a more difficult task.

If the ceiling was quite lofty, then the walls required a high dado, almost reaching the ceiling. The dado was to be divided three or four feet below the ceiling, and the lower part given a heavier coloration than the upper portion, in order to avoid a top-heavy look. If many pictures were to be hung, then the lower portion was to be either painted in a solid color or papered in a solid color, in order to set off the pictures properly. The upper portion would then be decorated with a frieze paper in a bold pattern, but of subdued coloration harmonizing with the lower part. Contrasts were to be avoided, but pale pinks, blues, and ambers could be blended above a blue-gray ground. The two portions of the dado were to be joined with a light wooden, black or brown railing, or with a line of paint.

The dado decoration could be altered by placing the patterned paper on the lower portion (if not many pictures were to be hung) and the solid color on the upper part. The purpose of the solid color, whatever the chosen scheme, was to give relief to the eye from the patterned paper.

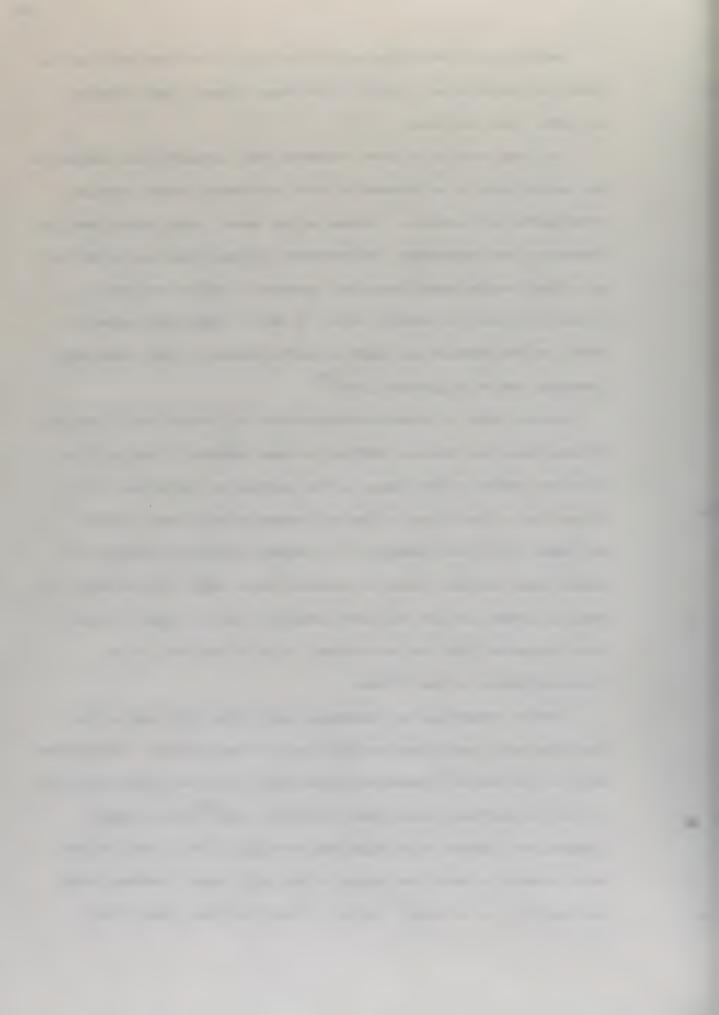

Having taken care of the ceiling and walls, the next step was to paint the woodwork and cornice of the room either a shade lighter or darker than the walls.

The final step to be taken concerned the fireplace, and called for the mantelpiece to be shrouded up with curtains of satin sheeting embroidered with crewels. Instead of the usual plain mirror over the fireplace, one surrounded with brackets holding china was called for, or a black wooden mantelpiece with squares of mirror set into it. It was felt that the overall effect of such a room would serve to bring out the dresses and faces of one's friends, rather than overpowering them with glaring tints. 37

Another facet of interior design dealt with specifically was the frieze, which was seen as bearing the same relation to the wall as does the cornice to the house, or the capital to the column. The proportion of the frieze to the wall seems to have been a matter of taste, but it was generally felt better to have the frieze too narrow than too wide, since a too-wide frieze would tend to make the ceiling appear too low, and lofty ceilings were in vogue. It was also recognized that the same effect could be achieved by an inappropriately colored frieze.

Correct proportion was important, and it was felt that a nine foot high wall should have an eight or nine inch frieze. Should the wall be ten feet six inches to eleven feet, then the frieze should be fifteen to eighteen inches wide. However, even with the proper proportions, correct coloration was necessary. There were friezes made to exactly match the design of the wall paper. However, this was not felt to be ideal. Rather, it was felt that they should relate but not match exactly, and that the frieze should be richer and more pronounced than the paper. The biggest mistake lay in using a paper and frieze which bore no relation to one another.

Should the paper be dark, it was felt better to have the ground of the frieze somewhat lighter and the colors generally brighter. Dark colors were to be avoided on friezes as this would make the ceiling appear too low. Light colors and gold were deemed proper for frieze backgrounds.

When the wall was over ten feet high, it was recommended that a narrow band of plain colored paper be placed immediately below the frieze. This band was in turn set off from the wall paper by a narrow wooden moulding, such as picture frame moulding. This band was to be of a tone harmonious with both frieze and wall paper.

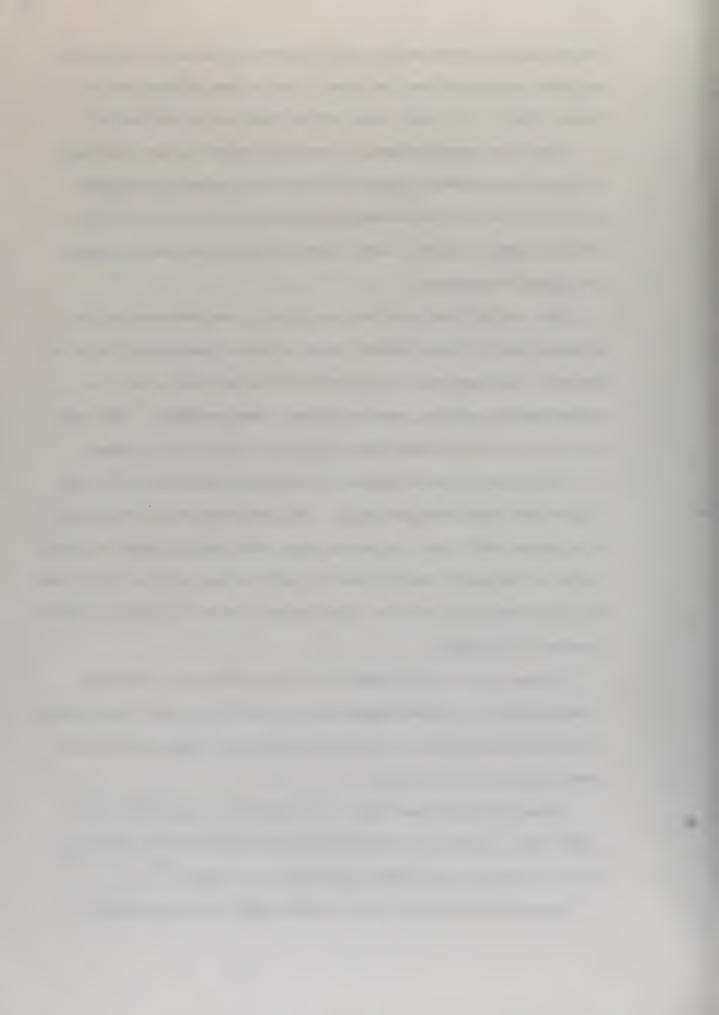

Window casings which projected beyond the lower edge of a wide frieze were considered unsightly. This was remedied by the placing of a narrow shelf over the casing, upon which small plaques or vases could be displayed, thus distracting one's attention from the frieze. Or, the curtain rod could be placed nearer the ceiling and the casing covered by a valance.

Friezes with vertical decoration or a floral motif were considered best in lower-ceilinged rooms, since they seem to add height.

If the decoration was of scroll or running vine form, then it was best suited for lofty rooms.

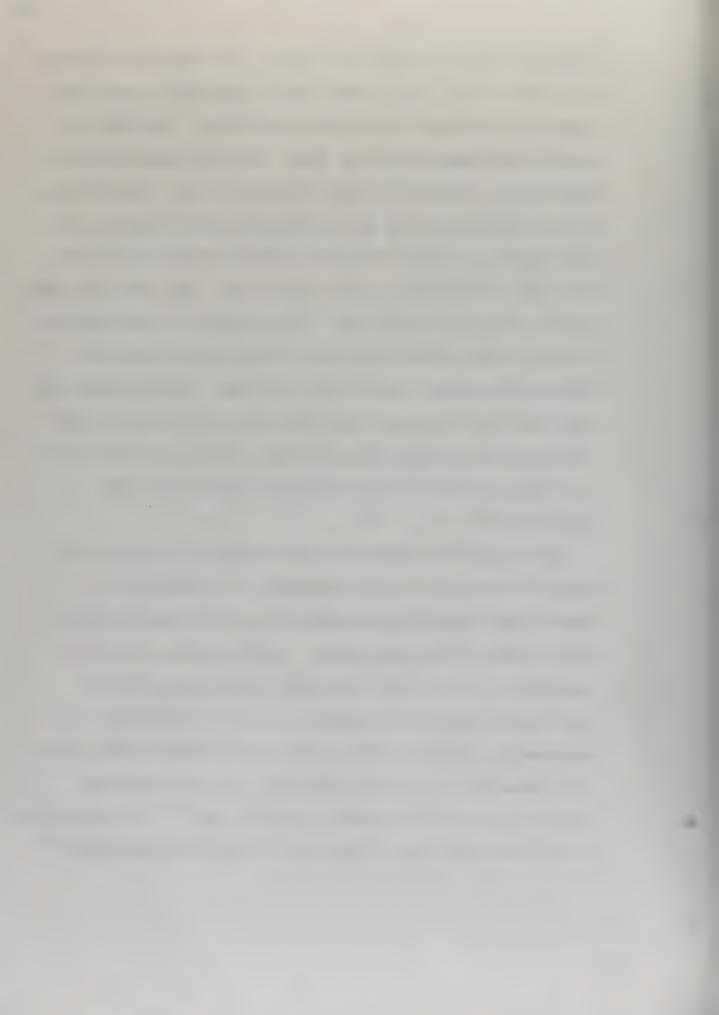

Since the frieze was high in the room and did not receive as much light, it was to be brighter in color than the wall paper, but not so prominent as to kill the effect of the paper. 38

As with the making of one's own distemper, it was necessary to prepare one's own paste for paper hanging. This was done by beating four pounds of good, white, wheat flour in cold water; a sufficient quantity of flour was used to form a thick batter. Then about two ounces of well-powdered alum was added. While the above mixing was taking place, a quantity of water was placed to boil. When boiling, it was taken from the fire and poured quickly over the batter, with rapid stirring. When the batter was observed to swell and lose the white color of the flour, it was ready for use. This made about three-quarters of a pail of solid paste. It was allowed to cool before use. To keep it from forming a skin over the top, a small quantity of cold water was poured over the top of the mass. In warm weather this paste could not be kept more than a few days, after which it would ferment and sour, turning thin and watery. However, the addition of a few drops of carbolic acid would allow it to be kept almost indefinitely. 39

By the end of the decade, the use of hardwood in the interior finish of houses was becoming fashionable. This practice had formerly been confined almost solely to the best business buildings and the houses of the most wealthy. By 1889, however, there were wholesale and retail dealers in hardwood lumber and timber in San Francisco, stocking or supplying mahogany, black walnut, quartered oak, plain oaks, ash, cherry, Spanish cedar, maple, white-wood, prima vera, newel posts, balusters, rail stocks, and all manner of plain and fancy veneers and fancy woods. The availability of these woods was due in no small part to increased ocean trade. 41

The art of graining was one which saw use on both exterior and interior wood surfaces. It was used to imitate costly woods with less expensive materials. It was also used during refurbishing and remodeling when a different style of wood was desired. For instance, the middle of the decade found black walnut in great demand by the well-to-do. The dwindling supply of that wood rendered it very expensive, far out of reach of the average home builder or owner. By the art of graining, ordinary pine could be made to look like the more expensive wood. 42

Obviously, to be successful, the student of this art had to study the properties of various woods quite carefully, lest his efforts appear false. He had to study the characteristics of grains and knots of all the cuts of wood, from trunk-sawn lumber to that taken from branches and roots. The methods of application could vary. For example, when imitating oak, the basic color of the wood was applied first, and then the checks, or pores, were stippled in afterward. To imitate walnut, the application was sometimes reversed; the pores could be laid on in distemper and the basic color then could be put on over this in an oil wash, leaving the pores plainly showing through. Of course, the best route for the student to take was to learn the trade from an experienced grainer. And it was recommended that the grainer work on a time-work basis, rather than piece-work, with pay being by the day. 43

The tools required for oak graining were a set of steel combs, a rubber comb, a sash tool, a flat paint brush and some clean rags. The rubber comb was to be three or four inches wide, twelve inches long and one-half inch thick. The back edge of the comb was to be notched with a knife to form quarter-inch teeth.

To begin, the ground color was applied. This was made from white lead tinted either with chrome yellow to which had been added a little red, or with yellow ochre alone. This gives a warm ground color. When dry, the ground was sand-papered smooth and was ready for graining. The color for graining was prepared by mixing burnt umber in oil, and some burnt sienna with two parts oil and one part turpentine. The amount of color used was quite small, since light oak required but little color for general work.

The actual graining was accomplished in the following manner:

The grain color was applied in sufficient quantity to evenly cover the surface of the work. The general growth forms of the grain were then made by covering the thumb with the rag and wiping, with slight pressure of the ball of the thumb sideways giving the sweeps and the thumbnail regulating the form and contractions. After this wiping was complete, the comb was used to give it grain. The work could then have shading added with a small brush, using the same color and feathering the edges to blend them in. With practice, the artist could duplicate virtually any cut of wood, from heartwood with its fairly standard grain to the swirling patterns of burly branch cuts.

Walnut graining was somewhat more complicated, there being more varied shades in walnut than in oak. The red shades were considered most pleasant, and were imitated by the use of a dark copper color ground, with a touch of Prussian blue added at times. The color was applied to the surface and, when dry, sanded smooth. The grain was applied by stippling, or pouncing, the color on with a brush held vertically. Distemper or water colors were used for this step, with burnt umber being used for light graining, and

Van Dyke brown added for dark graining. The colors were mixed with beer or vinegar to aid in their adhesion. When the distemper was dry, it was ready for the final coat. This consisted of umber in oil, thinned with turpentine or oil, and with a drop of japan added to set the color. (Note: Japan is a form of varnish which, when dry, gives a hard, brilliant surface.) This was spread over the previous work in sufficient thickness to give a good walnut shade, working only as much at one time as could be finished before the color began to set. Again, it was necessary for the grainer to be familiar with the various grains of different cuts of wood, since by the middle of the decade it was fashionable to grain doors to represent as many as three different cuts of walnut. The panels were done in walnut root, the rails in sap growth, and plain wood grain for the styles. The root grain was duplicated by working in short whirling masses of dark color, the grain weaving around curly burls like water around rocks. It was said to be a most difficult wood to imitate. 46.

Mahogany was imitated by preparing a ground of Venetian red tempered with a little white lead. Burnt sienna distemper was used for the pores, being applied by stippling, as previously discussed. When dry, it was given a light coat of varnish. At this time, it was ready for the over-graining. This was applied with a flat sponge, into one edge of which had been cut teeth-like points one-quarter to one-half inch apart. In application, a dark shade of color was put onto the middle of the sponge and a light shade on the sides. The sponge was then wet slightly and, holding the point toward the center, and starting with the point lightly touching, the light shades were drawn in an upward movement which gradually became heavy, forming a semi-circle. Then the sponge was drawn down in a wavy motion to the sides of the panel. Half the panel was grained at one time. When the first half was completed, the second half was done, thus producing a bi-laterally symmetrical panel. After the color was sponged on, a piece of card stock was taken and used to scrape back through the darks, opening sharp lights both right and left from center, from which the lighter color of the ground and the stippling shown through. A soft brush, known as a blender. was then used to soften the work in an upward course. When dry, a bristle-top (probably boar's bristle) graining brush was loaded with sufficient color to allow it to be drawn over the entire work from bottom to top. It was not to be too wet; just enough to allow the lines to be even in the half-circle movements from side to side. These lines were to be blended quickly in an upward movement, while the lower ends were blended with the sides in one mass. 47

Having finished the panels, the rest of the door could be finished in a simpler manner, since it was not felt that specific grain was required. It was sufficient to apply color in wavy light and dark lines, blended together at the edges.

The graining of maple or ash required a lighter ground. White, tinted with yellow, served as a ground for either of these woods. Either could be done with oil or water colors. Eaple was grained with raw sienna, and a little umber was added for ash. The curls in the grain were formed with thumb and cloth, followed by the blender. Bird's eye grain could be duplicated by grouping the fingers together and lightly tapping the work between the grain, and then blending these "eyes" to the grain in one direction, more in line with the various curves applied previously. 48

Pitch-pine, or Florida pine, was sometimes imitated, using a light ground similar to that used for oak, and grained as in oak, using equal parts of burnt and raw sienna in oil. The graining was very similar to oak, the main difference being in sharper points of color in the grain of heart growth.

Satinwood required a slightly more prepared surface. The ground, made up of white lead oil color tinted with either chrome yellow, raw sienna, or yellow ochre, was applied to a surface prepared with a mixture of whiting and beer. The graining color was composed of a mixture of Van Dyke brown or York brown and beer. rubbed on smooth. Next, a coarse sponge was moistened in beer and was drawn over the work, allowing the liquid to run in broad, wavy streaks. Taking a clean, moist camel hair brush, or mottler, the grainer then worked down the edges of these streaks with a jerky movement, thereby imparting the characteristic wavy edge to the streaks of color. The over-graining was accomplished with a color composed of Van Dyke brown, York brown, and black, mixed with beer. This color was applied first with a small, pointed sable brush to form the heart wood. This application was then softened with the blender. The rest of the over-grain color was then applied with a larger sable brush, the hairs of which had been separated with a comb. When dry, the entire work was to be varnished with two coats of pale oak varnish. 50

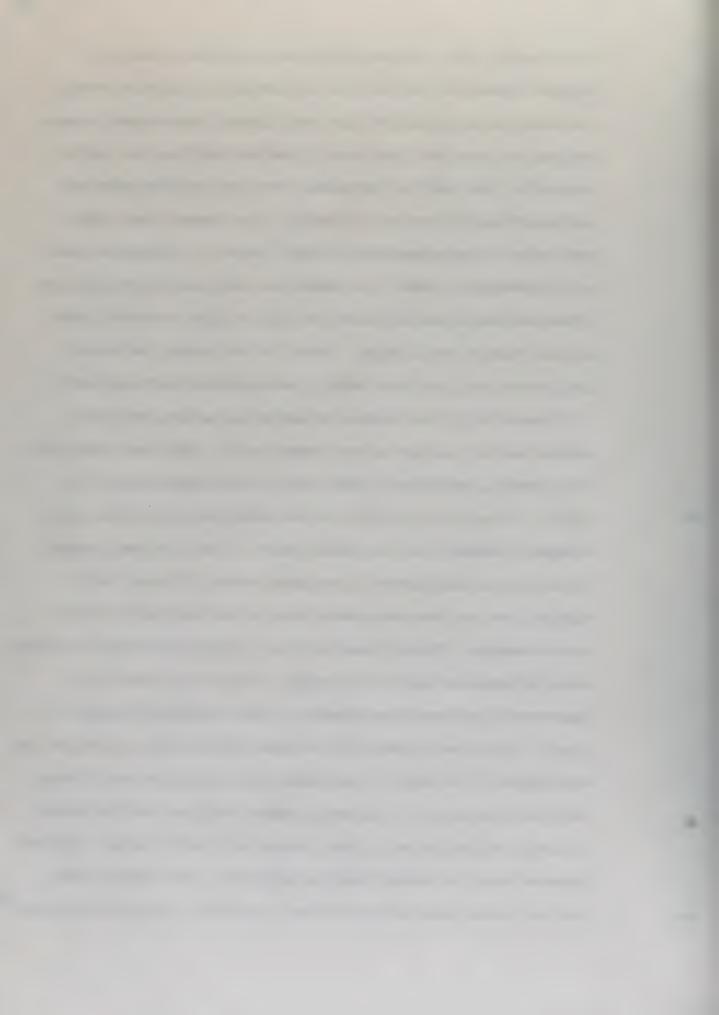

All things pass, and so it was with the popularity of graining.

As mentioned earlier, hardwoods tecame more available near the end of the decade, with a corresponding drop in prices. When this happened, there was less call for the grainer and his work, though the reader is cautioned that this was a gradual, not sudden, change; graining was practiced long after it had declined from its peak of popularity. But what had previously been a respectable trade was now looked upon by some as "dishonest." The common, cheap pines were hailed as being beautiful in their own way. Graining was seen as a subterfuge, a cheat. The remark was made that if one could not afford the more expensive woods, and did not like the natural color of pine, then he should paint. Paint, it was argued, was honest. Let pine be pine, and don't make it masquerade as something else. 51

Interestingly, the practice of making one material resemble another was not confined to the cheaper woods. Ebony was a desirable, but expensive, commodity in short supply at the beginning of the decade. To remedy this, a process was developed by which oak could be made to resemble the very costly ebony. A solution was prepared by boiling one part logwood in ten parts water, filtering this through linen and then evaporating this at low heat until half the volume remained. To each quart of this liquid was added ten to fifteen drops of saturated solution of indigo. The oak was prepared by immersing it for forty-eight hours in a hot, saturated solution of alum. It was then brushed with the logwood/indigo dye. After the dye was applied to the wood, it was rubbed with a saturated and filtered solution of verdigris (a poisonous pigment obtained from the action of acetic acid on copper) in hot, concentrated acetic acid. This was repeated until the proper black was achieved. When finished, the wood was washed carefully with water, then dried, oiled, and polished. 52

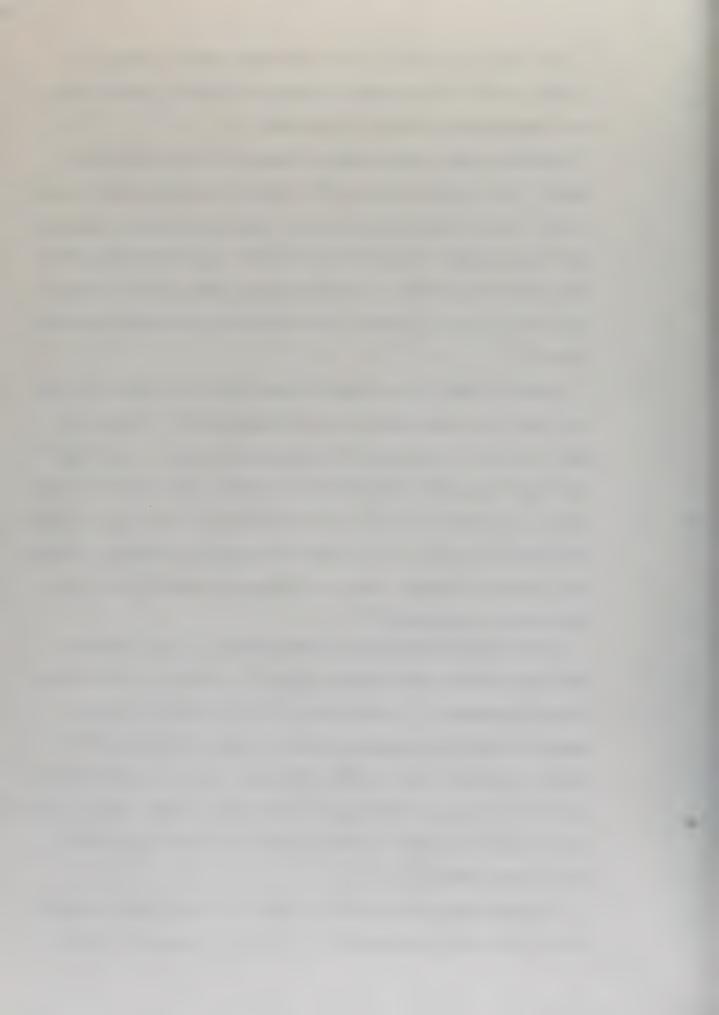

The desire for better, more structurally sound buildings led to improvement in construction techniques in the West, as well as to much experimentation related to building.

There was much experimentation nation-wide with "artificial stone." This material was used for building decorations which could be cast. San Francisco architect H.T. Bestor found that he obtained best results using a mixture of plasterers' gauge-stuff (plaster of Faris and caustic lime) and finely powdered rosin, formed in molds under heat. Earth or mineral colors could be incorporated into the mixture. 53

Another formula for artificial stone consisted of three and one-half parts clean sand and one part Portland cement. To this was added a mixture consisting of five gallons of water, to which had been added one gallon of the following mixture: One gallon silicate of soda, one pound carbonate of iron, one and one-half pounds graphite, two pounds raw umber, and two gallons of rainwater at boiling temperature, thoroughly mixed. The whole mixture was combined and brought to a working consistency. 54

Mastics were in wide use on the exterior of brick buildings. These were cements which served to seal the exterior of the building against the weather. A mastic made of one part sand, two parts ashes, and three parts clay was said to resist the actions of the weather almost as well as marble. Another, said to be particularly useful in sealing out dampness, was made from the best English Fortland cement mixed with water to the consistency of cream and applied with a large brush. 55

The development of an effective mastic was undoubtedly hastened by the fact that in earlier cement work in San Francisco, plaster of Paris was quite widely used as a component of the mortar, for reasons of economy. In theory, several coats of paint would suffice to protect the plaster of Paris from the weather; in fact, this did not hold true. Plaster of Paris had also been used for brackets, corbels, and other architectural forms found on the exterior of buildings. Needless to say, it was equally unsuitable in these applications. 56 resulting in stronger, more healthful structures. Double wall-boarding was found to add fully one hundred percent in strength and solidity to buildings, when properly nailed. The recurring mention of proper nailing is noteworthy. Nailing was an important factor, since mortising and tenoning was a technique seldom used in California. The best material for double wall-boarding was said to be 1"x4" tongue and groove Oregon pine, nailed with three nails at each nailing. 57

Double floors were also recommended, with the under-floor laid diagonally, a practice which is in use today. ⁵⁸ For structural strength, the flooring was to be filled out to all walls. Each board was to be nailed with two nails at each nailing, and the nails then set in with nail-sets. ⁵⁹

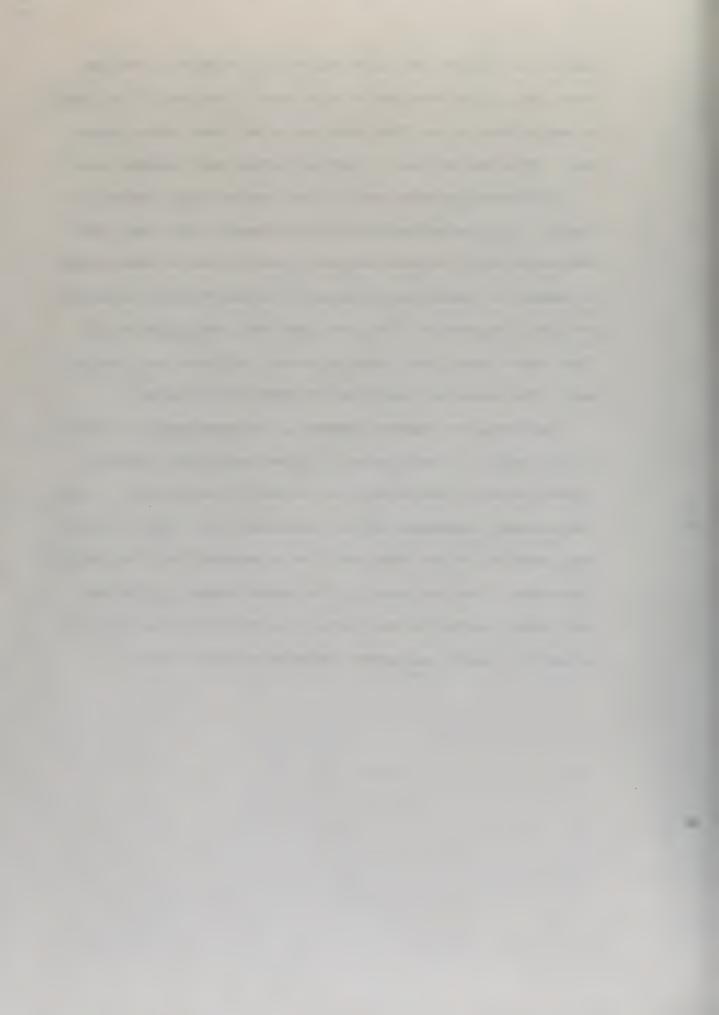

The task of caring for these floors meant substantial work for the period residents. Waxing floors was not the easy task we know today. First, it was necessary to prepare the wax by stirring twenty-five parts shredded yellow wax into a hot solution of twelve parts pearlash in soft water. (Pearlash was purified potash.) The mixture was stirred until effervescence ceased. It was then removed from the fire and twelve parts finely ground yellow ochre were stirred in. This was then poured into cans to cool. For use, one part of the prepared wax was dissolved in five parts of boiling water, and applied warm with a paint brush. When dry (a few hours) it was polished with a floor brush and wiped clean with a woolen cloth. This wax was said to last six months under ordinary use. 60

A different treatment was in order when preparing floors for dancing. This was accomplished by first sanding with sand paper, then waxing with a mixture prepared by melting two or three pounds of beeswax in a metal pot, allowing it to cool slightly and adding one pint of turpentine. This was mixed well and applied to the floor with a large paint brush and worked well into the floor by hand. The excess was then wiped off with a stiff cloth. 61

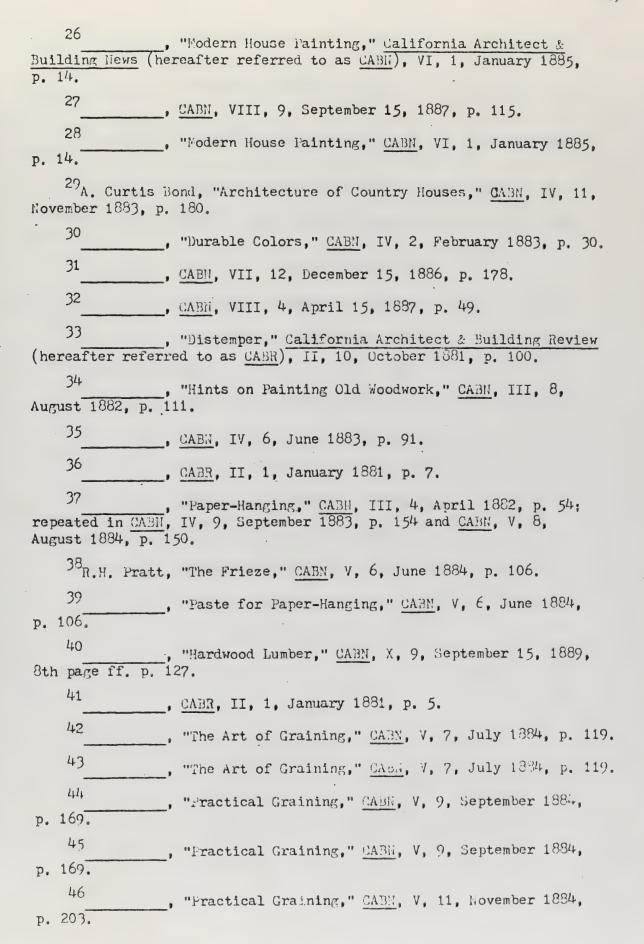

Considering the current interest in the preservation of houses of this period, it would be well if some thought were given to proper finishing, particularly in the case of restorations. Even the homeowner interested only in renovation could, with a little care, provide a finish which would be representative of the period. With modern firms now producing fine period wooden "gingerbread" and plaster details for such work, it is well within our grasp to accomplish complete and proper finishing of these houses.
